PRINCIPAL'S MESSAGE

November

On Tuesday 27/11, Mudgee High School went tropical for Movember.

Miss Messner and her PD17 class have been studying health promotion and put together a fantastic day for a great cause.

Movember aims to promote mental health, and an increased awareness of testicular cancer and prostate cancer.

The whole school attended an assembly where the PD17 class presented a factual video about men's health that was followed by a quiz for a panel of staff members, who were obliged to answer questions on the presentation we had all just seen.

Guest speaker Andy Gay spoke about his own experiences with mental health and the need to reach out when things are not going well.

His talk was insightful.

A Mo Bro parade was had. Mr Laidlaw and his turquoise facial growth were declared the winners. There was also a tropical fashion parade from among the students.

A big "Well done!" to the PD17 class, our guest speaker Andy Gay, our Mo Bro participants, our judges, the kids for their participation and of course to Miss Messner, the shaker and mover behind the event.

Controversial Issues in Schools

Last week saw student school strikes and protests in a number of centres, including capital cities, over what those organising and attending saw as continuing government inaction on climate change.

The media – both mainstream and social – loved it... or loved to hate it in some corners.

Climate change is one of those issues that fits under the heading of controversial, but only in the sense that it has the power to provoke heated exchanges. More on that last point later.

Like just about everything else, the Department of Education has a policy covering the management of controversial issues in schools.

Long story short, the “study of controversial issues is acceptable for educational purposes consistent with the delivery of curriculum and provision of school programs and activities.”

What does this mean on the ground? Teachers are obliged to, “manage controversial issues that may arise... (including the) views expressed by or the actions of... external providers and visitors (including speakers and officials), audio-visual materials or live performances.”

Schools are required to be neutral places for rational discourse and objective study. The discussion of controversial issues in schools, “... should allow students to explore a range of viewpoints and not advance the interest of any particular group.”

Where this last point has the potential to rattle some is when dearly held opinions face scrutiny.

Professor Brian Cox, the English physicist, has been quoted as saying, “... everyone has the right to an opinion, but crucially, that opinion can be roundly ignored and even made fun of, particularly if it is demonstrably non-sense!”

Ignored or made fun of... maybe not in a school setting. But scrutinised and possibly challenged? Absolutely! Even the silliest claims can be educational, especially when the lesson is centred on the important analytical skill of ‘considering the source.’

In the school context, consideration of controversial issues, which may include challenging some of the more unreasonable ones, must be age appropriate, sensitive to student needs, and relevant to the curriculum.

Challenging kids to think rather than regurgitate long lists of information – something Siri and Google do so much better than any of us – is what it is all about.

With regard to climate change, here’s a link you may find informative: <https://climate.nasa.gov/evidence/?fbclid=IwAR3puJEK49U2e4-mmmMb8qy-cVaZJYIBGXKGDxNwyw0InpYx6xN3JVHFROA>

The link will take you to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) page on climate change. As a taster, I have provided one of the site’s revealing graphs.

Who said learning stops at the school gate?

Until next week...
